On Monday, Conor Lamb, a Democrat running for the U.S. House in Pennsylvania's 18th district, announced an endorsement from Joe Biden. "It was a gut check for him," a Lamb campaign adviser told NBC News' Chuck Todd on Wednesday. "Joe Biden is one of the most respected people in the country. He believes in the politics of hope." Biden was recently thrust into his second term as vice president of the United States when U.S. President Barack Obama picked him to be his No. 2. And in that position, he's been busy. On Monday, Biden announced an endorsement from Lamb, who is running to take the Republican's seat in the 2018 midterm elections. Biden's decision came as a surprise to Lamb, who described it as a "mishap on his schedule." Lamb will have more gaffes than it is probably advisable to list, but one of his more memorable blunders has the former vice president calling him "young." Biden, who was born in 1942, is 75. The Lamb camp hopes the endorsement will help boost the congressman's profile in an upstate Pennsylvania district that backed President Donald Trump in 2016. Earlier this month, Lamb held a multi-candidate fundraiser at his home in Erie County. Todd, the host of "Meet the Press," asked the adviser what worked for Lamb in that event. "He runs his own race," the adviser said

Infinite Adventures is a reverse to the archetypal RPG, where the player (character) is in a dungeon and the DM (gamesmaster) is in the player's land and wants him to leave. The player's character just entered the dungeon and has yet to use anything, so he comes across the DM who gives him a book on card game. The player opens the book and sees a dwarf pushing his way through the dungeon. Like the player, the DM just came up with this character and wants him to find something. Both characters have few possessions. The ring the player wants is that of a cleric casting enchantment. The players characters lack such and the DM gives another character a ring he found in a chest in the dungeon. Play the Game Starting a campaign Both players and the DM work together to explore the dungeon and set traps. Both characters successfully defeat each other's traps. As expected the player characters find a chest that leads to a series of tunnels strewn with traps. At the end of one of the tunnels the player's character sees a square trap door and climbs into a tower. He finds scrolls he can read which riddles him; the answer is the name of a village on another continent. The DM has been establishing a relationship with his players. He is always thinking of creative things to do in the dungeon. He says he wants to help the players in their quest for their ring. He has been collecting secret treasures on the dungeon floor. He ditches them out of the dungeon to discourage the player's character from emptying his pockets of his many artifacts. The DM asks the player's character to perform a test of skill. The DM distracts two enemies in a nearby portcullis. Both the player's character and the DM's character are to lift the portcullis, place it at a location the DM has specified where the player's character passes. The DM tells the player's character he should pass, anticipating that the player will have trouble
