Friday, January 18, 2010 Home Improvement: Gadgets We had an 'outdoor' party last night. That is a euphemism for socializing at my mother's house (heck, out of an office). The kids and I all wore sweaters and warm jackets, but my son and I were outside playing on their trampoline (yeah) and sticking our heads out of the window. Within seconds of entering the house, I knew I had stepped into the living room of the seventies. Not just the decorations, but the fluorescent light fixtures, the telephones (which were all working, not just the ones that actually worked), the 'jams' and the cassettes. As a kid I came to understand that decorating choices were a reflection of the era: the colors were happy, bright, and fun. In the seventies people had cool pendants above their beds that hung down from their telephone poles and sat on the table as part of the room setting. Colors were used sparingly, bringing out the fact that everything was new. There was a lot of orange in the seventies. The general rule was that clothes were more colorful than faces. My sister's wedding dress was white and pearlescent and she had a handkerchief in her silver and white purse that covered her face when people approached to pay their respects. She told my parents that she just wanted to be able to breathe. The washing machine was large, with a revolving agitator that I could not imagine e79caf774b
