Some researchers say the runts are genetically inferior. In addition to the genetic inferiority of runts, runts may experience slower growth and weaker bones. Younger runts are thought to be less adaptable to the world than their older counterparts. Runts are often banished, but in the wrong household they may be rescued and raised by the family pet. In the wild, such runts are an easy target for predators, and they may be hunted or killed. Female gryphons often hunt runts on land in the absence of their mate or cubs. Thus, in the absence of their mother, runts are at risk. In both the wild and in captivity, runts may develop bony growths on their face, shoulders, and other areas. Such growths are sometimes associated with animal abuse and may be caused by malnutrition. The growths may become infected or cancerous, and they may be treated by surgery. If runts survive these risks, they will usually grow into normalized gryphons, which will mate and produce healthy cubs. The mating of a mature and a young gryphon is especially risky, and runts are extremely rare. Also, when two mature gryphons breed, runts are rarely produced. Eggs obtained from a mature female often fail to hatch and contain deformed animals, known as "incubators". The runt of the litter is usually raised by the female. The gryphon may find a suitable young gryphon to co-raise and the young pair will breed. The runt may or may not be raised by the young. Some pairs bond closely together and produce cubs together. This is most common among wolves. Gryphon pups born from two different mothers may fight each other for the attention of the female. Rarely, two adult gryphons may form an attachment to each other, and may nest together. In some cases, they may even defend their nesting site against other gryphons. The nesting of two adult gryphons is not common. Although mating between a male and an adult female may lead to the birth of runts, the two may also produce cubs. Males sometimes mate with young adult females in order to create a hybrid between the male gryphon's appearance and the young female's. The most extreme form of this is the creation of
